

65 years of service to the health care & helping professions.

Journal of Doctoral Nursing Practice Peer Review Process

The Journal of Doctoral Nursing Practice (JDNP) utilizes a double-blind, peer review process and requires a minimum of two reviews for all manuscripts. Reviewers must indicate any potential conflicts of interest which may exclude them from being a reviewer for a particular article. Reviewers are given six questions to answer to guide their reviews; these include:

1. Will this manuscript be of interest to readers of the JDNP?
2. Does the manuscript present a clear and focused message? Please summarize the main question, issue, or problem. If the primary message is difficult to synthesize, please indicate how the presentation of the message can be strengthened.
3. Is the manuscript well written? Organized? Easy to follow? Does the abstract accurately reflect what the manuscript says? Are the references up to date and relevant?
4. Does the manuscript represent a new or important contribution to the literature? What contribution, if any, does the manuscript make to the body of knowledge about the topic it addresses? Is the issue, or author(s)' approach to it, original? Relevant? Timely? Innovative?
5. Does the information presented in the manuscript have the potential to change thinking or practice/ How will the article influence its field?
6. If the manuscript has a research component, are appropriate elements presented? (If not applicable, please enter 'N/A'). For example, is the research question posed clearly defined and appropriately answered? Is the literature cited relevant and up to date? Is the Study Design adequate to answer the research question? If human subjects are involved, was this addressed, and IRB approval indicated? Are the Results credible and supported? And are the Conclusions justified by the Results?

Reviewers then make a final recommendation of “Accept”, “Minor revision”, “Major revision” or “Reject.” Reviewers are given the option to provide confidential comments to the Editor. The Editor makes the final decision regarding acceptance in all cases.

